The late Lord Chesterfield having been universally allowed to be one of the best bred men of the age, and most intimately acquainted with the principles and manners of mankind, the Editor of the following pages humbly apprehends, he could not do the rising generation a greater service, than by collecting those valuable precepts that are contained in his celebrated letters to his son, digesting them under distinct heads, and thereby forming a system of the most useful instruction.

To that end, he has diligently selected every observation and remark, that can possibly improve or inform the mind, within the rules of morality; and where there seemed a deficiency in any part of the system, from the occasional chasms in Lord Chesterfield's correspondence, he has endeavoured to supply it. Much might have been said on the subject of indecency, delicacy, but as instructions on that head, to persons possessed of a liberal education, must have been unnecessary, they are here purposely omitted. Some may be apt to think that many things in this work are too frivolous to be mentioned; but when it is remembered they are calculated for the multitude, it is presumed they will be received as respectable admonitions.

In short, it has been the Editor's study to make Lord Chesterfield useful to every class of youth; to lay that instruction before them, which they with difficulty must have found amidst a heap of other matter; in a word, to give the very essence of his letters, and at a tenth part of the price those letters fell for.
PRINCIPLES OF POLITENESS, &c.

As all young men, on their first outset in life, are in want of some experienced and friendly hand to bring them forward and teach them a knowledge of the world; I think I cannot do the rising generation a greater service, than by directing the young man's steps, and teaching him how to make his way among the crowd. I will suppose him already instructed in the principles of religion and necessity.
of moral virtues, (for without these he must be most unhappy) of course shall, in a series of chapters, point out, under distinct heads, the qualifications necessary to make him well received in the world, without which he cannot expect to bear his part in life, agreeable to his own wishes, or the duty he owes to society; and as modesty is the basis of a proper reception, I shall begin with that.

MODESTY.

MODESTY is a polite accomplishment, and generally an attendant upon merit: It is engaging to the highest degree, and wins the heart of all our acquaintance. On the contrary, none

none are more disgusting in company than the impudent and presuming.

The man who is, on all occasions, commending and speaking well of himself, we naturally dislike. On the other hand, he who studies to conceal his own deserts, who does justice to the merit of others, who talks but little of himself, and that with modesty, makes a favourable impression on the persons he is conversing with, captivates their minds, and gains their esteem.

Modesty, however, widely differs from an awkward bashfulness, which is as much to be condemned as the other is to be applauded. To appear simple is as ill bred as to be impudent. A young man ought to be able.
to come into a room and address the company without the least embarrassment. To be out of countenance when spoken to, and not to have an answer ready, is ridiculous to the last degree.

An awkward country fellow, when he comes into company better than himself, is exceedingly disconcerted. He knows not what to do with his hands, or his hat, but either puts one of them in his pocket, and dangles the other by his side; or perhaps twirls his hat on his fingers, or fumbles with the button. If spoken to, he is in a much worse situation, he answers with the utmost difficulty, and nearly stammers. Whereas a gentleman who is acquainted with life, enters a room with gracefulness and a modest assurance, addresses even even persons he does not know, in an easy and natural manner, and without the least embarrassment. This is the characteristic of good breeding, a very necessary knowledge in our intercourse with men; for one of inferior parts, with the behaviour of a gentleman, is frequently better received than a man of sense with the address and manners of a clown.

Ignorance and vice are the only things we need be ashamed of; steer clear of these, and you may go into any company you will; not that I would have a young man throw off all dread of appearing abroad, as a fear of offending, or being disesteemed, will make him preserve a proper decorum. Some persons, from experiencing the inconveniences of of false modesty, have run into the other extreme, and acquired the character of impudent. This is as great a fault as the other. A well bred man keeps himself between the two, and steers the middle way. He is easy and firm in every company; is modest, but not bashful; steady, but not impudent. He copies the manners of the better people, and conforms to their customs with ease and attention.

Until we can present ourselves in all companies with coolness and unconcern, we can never present ourselves well; nor will a man ever be supposed to have kept good company, or ever be acceptable in such company, if he cannot appear there easy and unembarrassed. A modest assurance, in every part of life, is the most most advantageous qualification we can possibly acquire.

Instead of becoming insolent, a man of sense under a consciousness of merit, is more modest. He behaves himself with firmness, but without the least presumption. The man who is ignorant of his own merit is no less a fool than he who is constantly displaying it. A man of understanding avails himself of his abilities, but never boasts of them; whereas the timid and bashful can never push himself in life, but will be always kept behind by the forward and bustling. A man of abilities, and acquainted with life, will stand as firm in defence of his own rights, and pursue his plans as steadily and unmoved, as the most impudent man alive; but then then he does it with a seeming modesty. Thus manner is everything: what is impudence in one, is proper assurance only in another; for firmness is commendable, but an overbearing conduct is disgusting.

Forwardness being the very reverse of modesty, follow rather than lead the company; that is, join in discourse upon subjects rather than start one of your own; if you have parts, you will have opportunities enough of shewing them on every topic of conversation; and if you have none, it is better to expose yourself upon a subject of other people’s than one of your own.

But, be particularly careful not to speak of yourself if you can help it. An impudent fellow lugs in himself abruptly upon all all occasions, and is ever the hero of his own story. Others will colour their arrogance with, "It may seem strange, indeed, that I should talk in this manner of myself; it is what I by no means like, and should never do, if I had not been cruelly and unjustly accused; but when my character is attacked, it is a justice I owe to myself, to defend it." This veil is too thin not to be seen through on the first inspection.

Others again, with more art, will modestly boast of all the principal virtues, by calling these virtues weaknesses, and saying they are so unfortunate as to fall into weaknesses. "I cannot see persons suffer," says one of this cast, "without relieving them; though my circumstances are very unable to afford it.—I cannot avoid speaking truth, though it is often very imprudent," and so on.

This angling for praise is so prevailing a principle, that it frequently stoops to the lowest objects. Men will often boast of doing that, which if true, would be rather a disgrace to them than otherwise. One man affirms that he rode twenty miles within the hour; it is probably a lie; but suppose he did, What then? He had a good horse under him, and is a good jockey. Another swears he has often, at a sitting, drank five or six bottles to his own share. Out of respect to him, I will believe him a liar, for I would not wish to think him a beast.

These and many more are the follies of idle people, which, while they think think they procure them esteem, in reality make them despised.

To avoid this contempt, therefore, never speak of yourself at all, unless necessity obliges you; and even then, take care to do it in such a manner, that it may not be construed into fishing for applause. Whatever perfections you may have, be assured, people will find them out; but whether they do or not, nobody will take them upon your own word. The less you say of yourself, the more the world will give you credit for; and the more you say, the less they will believe you.

LYING.

Of all the vices, there is no one more criminal, more mean, and more ridiculous, than lying. The end we design by it is very seldom accomplished, for lies are always found out, at one time or other; and yet there are persons who give way to this vice, who are otherwise of good principles, and have not been ill educated.

Lies generally proceed from vanity, cowardice, and a revengeful disposition, and sometimes from a mistaken notion of self defence.

He who tells a malicious lie, with a view of injuring the person he speaks of, may gratify his wish for a while, but will, in the end, find it recoil upon himself; for, as soon as he is detected, (and detected he most certainly will be) he is despised for the infamous attempt, and whatever he
he may say hereafter of that person, will be considered as false, whether it be so or not.

If a man lies, shuffles, or equivocates, (for, in fact, they are all alike,) by way of excuse for any thing he has said or done, he aggravates the offence rather than lessens it; for the person to whom the lie is told has a right to know the truth, or there would have been no occasion to have framed a falsehood. This person, of course, will think himself ill treated for being a second time affronted; for, What can be a greater affront than an attempt to impose upon any man's understanding? Besides, lying, in excuse for a fault, betrays fear, than which nothing is more daftardly, and unbecoming the character of a gentleman.
There is nothing more manly, or more noble, if we have done wrong, than frankly to own it. It is the only way of meeting forgiveness. Indeed, confessing a fault and asking pardon, with great minds, is considered as a sufficient atonement. "I have been betrayed into an error," or, "I have injured you, Sir, and am heartily ashamed of it, and sorry for it," has frequently disarmed the person injured, and where he would have been our enemy, has made him our friend.

There are persons also, whose vanity leads them to tell a thousand lies. They persuade themselves, that, if it be no way injurious to others, it is harmless and innocent; and they shelter their falsehoods under the shelter name name of untruths. These persons are foolish enough to imagine, that if they can recite anything wonderful, they draw the attention of the company, and if they themselves are the objects of that wonder, they are looked up to as persons extraordinary. This has made many a man see things that never were in being, hear things that never were said, and achieve feats that never were attempted, dealing always in the marvellous. Such may be assured, however unwilling the persons they are conversing with may be to laugh in their faces, that they hold them secretly in the highest contempt; for he who will tell a lie thus idly, will not scruple to tell a greater where his interest is concerned. Rather than any person should doubt PRINCIPLES of doubt of my veracity for one minute, I would deprive myself of telling abroad either what I had really seen or heard, if such things did not carry with them the face of probability.

Others again will boast of the great respect they meet with in certain companies; of the honours that are continually heaped on them there; of the great price they give for every thing they purchase; and this to be thought of consequence; but unless such people have the best and most accurate memory, they will, perhaps, very soon after contradict their former assertions, and subject themselves to contempt and derision.

Remember then, as long as you live, that nothing but strict truth can carry you through life with.
with honour and credit. Liars are not only disagreeable but dangerous companions, and when known, will ever be shunned by men of understanding. Besides, as the greatest liars are generally the greatest fools, a man who addicts himself to this detestable vice, will not only be looked upon as vulgar, but will never be considered as a man of sense.

GOOD BREEDING.

VOID of good breeding, every other qualification will be imperfect, unadorned, and to a certain degree unavailing.

Good breeding being the result of good sense and good nature, Is it not wonderful that people possessed of the one should should be deficient in the other? The modes of it varying according to persons, places, and circumstances, cannot indeed be acquired otherwise than by time and observation; but the substance is everywhere and always the same.

What good morals are to society in general, good manners are to particular ones; their band and security. Of all actions, next to that of performing a good one, the consciousness of rendering a civility is the most grateful.

We seldom see a person, let him be ever so ill bred, wanting in respect to those whom he acknowledges to be his superiors; the manner of shewing this respect, then, is all I contend for. The well bred man expresses it naturally and easily, while he who who is unused to good company expresses it awkwardly. Study, then, to shew that respect which every one wishes to shew in an easy and graceful way; but this must be learnt by observation.

In company with your equals or in mixed companies, a greater latitude may be taken in your behaviour; yet, it should never exceed the bounds of decency; for though no one in this case can claim any distinguished marks of respect, every one is entitled to civility and good manners. A man need not, for example, fear to put his hands in his pockets, take snuff, sit, stand, or occasionally walk about the room; but it would be highly unbecoming to whistle, wear his hat, loosen his garters, or throw himself across the chairs. Such liberties liberties are offensive to our equals, and insulting to our inferiors. Easiness of carriage by no means implies inattention and carelessness. No one is at liberty to act in all respects as he pleases; but is bound by the laws of good manners to behave with decorum.

Let a man talk to you ever so stupidly or frivolously, not to pay some attention to what he says, is savageness, to the greatest degree. Nay, if he even forces his conversation to you, it is worse than rudeness not to listen to him; for your inattention in this case, tells him, in express terms, that you think him a blockhead and not worth the hearing. Now, if such behaviour is rude to men, it is much more so to women, who, be their rank what what it will, have, on account of their sex, a claim to officious attention from the men. Their little wants and whims, their likes and dislikes, and even their impertinences, are particularly attended to and flattered, and their very thoughts and wishes guessed at and instantly gratified by every well bred man.

In promiscuous companies, you should vary your address, agreeable to the different ages of the persons you speak to. It would be rude and absurd to talk of your amours or your pleasures to men of certain dignity and gravity, to clergymen, or men in years; but still you should be as easy with them as with others, your manner only should be varied; you should, if possible, double your respect and and attention to them; and were you to insinuate occasionally, that from their observation and experience you wish to profit, you would insensibly win their esteem; for flattery, if not fulsome and gross, is agreeable to all.

When invited to dinner or supper, you must never usurp to yourself the best places, the best dishes, &c. but always decline them, and offer them to others, except, indeed, you are offered any thing by a superior, when it would be a rudeness, if you liked it, not to accept it immediately, without the least apology. Thus, for example, was a superior, the master of the table, to offer you a thing of which there was but one, to pass it to the person next you, would be be indirectly charging him that offered it to you, with a want of good manners and proper respect to his company; or, if you were the only stranger present, it would be a rudeness if you would make a feint of refusing it with the customary apology, "I cannot think of taking it from you, Sir;" or, "I am sorry to deprive you of it;" as it is supposed he is conscious of his own rank, and if he chose not to give it, would not have offered it; your apology therefore, in this case, is putting him upon an equality with yourself. In like manner it is rudeness to draw back when requested by a superior to pass a door first, or to step into a carriage before him. In short, it would be endless to particularize all the instances stances in which a well bred man shews his politeness in good company, such as not yawning, sing- ing, whistling, warming his breech at the fire, lounging, putting his legs upon the chairs, and the like familiarities every man's good sense must condemn, and good breeding abhor.

But, good breeding consists in more than merely not being ill bred. To return a bow, speak when you are spoken to, and say nothing rude, are such negative acts of good breeding, that they are little more than not being a brute. Would it not be a very poor commendation of any man's cleanliness to say that he was not offensive? If we wish for the good will and esteem of our acquaintance, our good breeding must be active, cheerful, officious and seducing.
For example, should you invite any one to dine or sup with you, recollect whether ever you had observed them to prefer one thing to another, and endeavour to procure that thing; when at table, say, "At such a time, I think you seemed to give this dish a preference, I therefore ordered it." "This is the wine I observed you best like, I have therefore been at some pains to procure it." Trifling as these things may appear, they prove an attention to the person they are said to; and as attention in trifles is the test of respect, the compliment will not be lost.

I need only refer you to your own breast. How have these little attentions, when shewn you by others, flattered that self love which no man is free from?

They incline and attach us to that person, and prejudice us afterwards to all that he says or does. The declarations of the women in a great degree stamp a man's reputation of being either ill or well bred; you must then in a manner, overwhelm them with these attentions; they are used to them, and naturally expect them, and to do them justice, they are seldom lost upon them. You must be sedulous to wait upon them, pick up with alacrity any thing they drop, and be very officious in procuring their carriages or their chairs in public places; be blind to what you should not see, and deaf to what you should not hear. Opportunities of shewing these attentions are continually presenting themselves; but in case they should not, you must study to create them.

If ever you would be esteemed by the women, your conversation to them should be always respectful, lively, and addressed to their vanity. Every thing you say or do, should tend to shew a regard to their beauty or good sense; even men are not without their vanities of one kind or other, and flattering that vanity by words and looks of approbation, is one of the principal characters of good breeding.

Address and manners, with weak persons, who are actually three fourths of the world, are every thing; and even people of the best understanding are taken in with them. Where the heart is not won and the eye pleased, the mind will seldom be on our side.

In
In short, learning and erudition, without good breeding, is tiresome and pedantic; and an ill bred man is as unfit for good company as he will be unwelcome in it. Nay, he is full as unfit for business as for company. Make then good breeding the great object of your thoughts and actions. Be particularly observant of, and endeavour to imitate, the behaviour and manners of such as are distinguished by their politeness; and be persuaded, that good breeding is to all worldly qualifications, what charity is to all Christian virtues; it adorns merit, and often covers the want of it.

GENTEEEL CARRIAGE.

Next to good breeding is a genteel manner and carriage, riage, wholly free from those ill habits and awkward actions, which many very worthy persons are addicted to.

A genteel manner of behaviour, how trifling soever it may seem, is of the utmost consequence in private life. Men of very inferior parts have been esteemed, merely for their genteel carriage and good breeding, while sensible men have given disgust for want of it. There is something or other that prepossesses us at first sight in favour of a well-bred man, and makes us wish to like him.

When an awkward fellow first comes into a room, he attempts to bow, and his sword, if he wears one, goes between his legs, and nearly throws him down. Confused and ashamed, he he stumbles to the upper end of the room, and seats himself in the very chair he should not. He there begins playing with his hat, which he presently drops; and recovering his hat, he lets fall his cane; and in picking up his cane, down goes his hat again; thus it is a considerable time before he is adjusted. When his tea or coffee is handed to him he spreads his handkerchief upon his knees, scalds his mouth, drops either the cup or the saucer, and spills the tea or coffee in his lap. At dinner he is more uncommonly awkward; there he tucks his napkin through a button hole, which tickles his chin, and occasions him to make a variety of wry faces; he seats himself upon the edge of the chair, at so great a distance from the table, that he frequently drops his meat between his plate and his mouth; he holds his knife, fork and spoon differently from other people; eats with his knife, to the manifest danger of his mouth; picks his teeth with his fork, rakes his mouth with his finger, and puts his spoon, which has been into his throat a dozen times, into the dish again. If he is to carve, he cannot hit the joint, but in labouring to cut through the bone, splashes the sauce over every body's clothes. He generally daubs himself all over; his elbows are in the next person's plate, and he is up to the knuckles in soup and grease. If he drinks, it is with his mouth full, interrupting the whole company with, "To your good health, Sir," and "My service to you;" perhaps coughs in his glass, and besprinkles the the whole table. Further, he has, perhaps, a number of disagreeable tricks;—he sniffs up his nose, picks it with his fingers, blows it and looks in his handkerchief; crams his hands first into his bosom and next into his breeches. In short, he neither dresses nor acts like any other person, but is particularly awkward in every thing he does. All this, I own, has nothing in it criminal; but it is such an offence to good manners and good breeding, that it is universally despised; it makes a man ridiculous in every company, and of course, ought carefully to be avoided by every one who would wish to please.

From this picture of the ill bred man, you will easily discover that of the well bred; for you may readily judge what you ought to do.
do, when you are told what you ought not to do; a little attention to the manners of those who have seen the world, will make a proper behaviour habitual and familiar to you.

Actions that would otherwise be pleasing, frequently become ridiculous by your manner of doing them. If a lady drops her fan in company, the worst bred man would immediately pick it up, and give it to her; the best bred man can do no more; but then he does it in a graceful manner, that is sure to please, whereas the other would do it so awkwardly as to be laughed at.

You may also know a well bred person by his manner of sitting. Ashamed and confused, the awkward man sits in his chair stiff and bolt upright, whereas the man of fashion, is easy in every position; instead of lolling or lounging as he sits, he leans with elegance, and by varying his attitudes, shews that he has been used to good company. Let it be one part of your study, then, to learn to sit genteelly in different companies, to loll gracefully, where you are authorized to take that liberty, and to sit up respectfully, where that freedom is not allowable.

In short, you cannot conceive how advantageous a graceful carriage and a pleasing address are, upon all occasions; they ensnare the affections, steal a prepossession in our favour, and play about the heart until they engage it.

Now to acquire a graceful air you must attend to your dancing; no one can either sit, stand or walk well, unless he dances well.
And, in learning to dance, be particularly attentive to the motion of your arms, for a stiffness in the wrist will make any man look awkward. If a man walks well, presents himself well in company, wears his hat well, moves his head properly, and his arms gracefully, it is almost all that is necessary.

There is also an awkwardness in speech that naturally falls under this head, and ought to, and may be guarded against; such as forgetting names, andmistaking one name for another; to speak of Mr. What-d'ye-call-him, or You-know-who. Mrs. Thingum, What's-her-name, or How-d'ye-call-her, is exceeding awkward and vulgar. It is the same to address people by improper titles, as sir for my lord, to begin a story without being able able to finish it, and break off in the middle with "I have forgot the rest."

Our voice and manner of speaking, too, should likewise be attended to. Some will mumble over their words, so as not to be intelligible, and others will speak so fast as not to be understood, and in doing this, will sputter and spit in your face; some will bawl as if they were speaking to the deaf; others will speak so low as scarcely to be heard; and many will put their face so close to yours, as to offend you with their breath. All these habits are horrid and disgusting, but may easily be got the better of with care. They are the vulgar characteristics of a low bred man, or are proofs that very little pains have been bestowed in his education. In short, an attention to these little matters is of greater importance than you are aware of; many a sensible man having lost ground for want of these little graces, and many a one, possessed of these perfections alone, having made his way through life, that otherwise would not have been noticed.

CLEANLINESS OF PERSON.

But, as no one can please in company, however graceful his air, unless he be clean and neat in his person, this qualification comes next to be considered.

Negligence of one's person, not only implies an unsufferable indolence, indolence, but an indifference whether we please or not. In others, it betrays an indolence and affectation, arising from a presumption, that they are sure of pleasing, without having recourse to those means which many are obliged to use.

He who is not thoroughly clean in his person, will be offensive to all he converses with. A particular regard to the cleanliness of your mouth, teeth, hands, and nails, is but common decency. A foul mouth and unclean hands, are certain marks of vulgarity; the first is the cause of an offensive breath, which nobody can bear, and the last is declarative of dirty work; one may always know a gentleman by the state of his hands and nails. The flesh at the roots should be kept back, so as to show the semicircles at the bottom of the nails; the edges of the nails should never be cut down below the ends of the fingers, nor should they be suffered to grow longer than the fingers. When the nails are cut down to the quick, it is a shrewd sign that the man is a mechanic, to whom long nails would be troublesome, or that he gets his bread by fiddling; and if they are longer than his fingers' ends, and encircled with a black rim, it foretells he has been laboriously and meanly employed and too fatigued to clean himself: A good apology for want of cleanliness in a mechanic, but the greatest disgrace that can attend a gentleman.

These things may appear too insignificant to be mentioned; but when it is considered that a thousand little nameless things, which every one feels but no one can describe, conspire to form that whole of pleasing, I hope you will not call them trifling. Besides, a clean shirt and a clean person are as necessary to health, as not to offend other people. It is a maxim with me, which I have lived to see verified, that he who is negligent at twenty years of age, will be a sloven at forty, and intolerable at fifty.

DRESS.

NEATNESS of person I observed, was as necessary as cleanliness; of course, some attention must be paid to your dress.
Such is the absurdity of the times, that to pass well with the world, we must adopt some of its customs, be they ridiculous or not.

In the first place, to neglect one's dress is to affront all the female part of our acquaintance. The women in particular pay an attention to their dress; to neglect, therefore, yours, will displease them, as it would be tacitly taxing them with vanity, and declaring that you thought them not worth that respect which everybody else does. And, as I have mentioned before, as it is the women who stamp a young man's credit, in the fashionable world, if you do not make yourself agreeable to the women, you will assuredly lose ground with the men.

Dress, as trifling as it may appear pear to a man of understanding, prepossesses on the first appearance, which is frequently decisive. And indeed we may form some opinion of a man's sense and character from his dress. Any exceeding of the fashion, or any affectation in dress, whatever, argues a weakness in understanding, and nine times out of ten, it will be found so.

There are few young fellows but what display some character or other in this shape. Some would be thought fearless and brave; these wear a black cravat, a short coat and waistcoat, an uncommon long sword hanging to their knees, a large hat, fiercely cocked, and are flash all over.—Others affect to be country squires—these will go about in buckskin breeches, brown frocks, and great great oaken cudgels in their hands, flouched hats, with their hair undressed and tucked up, under them, to an enormous size, and imitate grooms and country boobies so well externally, that there is not the least doubt of their resembling them as well internally. Others again, paint and powder themselves so much, and dress so finically, as leads us to suppose they are only women in boys' clothes. Now a sensible man carefully avoids all this, or any other affectation. He dresses as fashionably and well as persons of the best families and best sense; if he exceeds them he is a coxcomb; if he dresses worse, he is unpardonable.

Dress yourself fine, then, if possible; or plain, agreeable to the company you are in; that is, conform PRINCIPLES of conform to the dress of others, and avoid the appearance of being tumbled. Imitate those reasonable people of your own age, whose dress is neither remarked as too neglected or too much studied. Take care to have your clothes well made, in the fashion, and to fit you, or you will, after all, appear awkward. When once dressed, think no more of it; shew no fear of discomposing your dress, but let all your motions be as easy and unembarrassed, as if you was at home in your dishabille.

ELEGANCE of EXPRESSION.

HAVING mentioned elegance of person, I will proceed to elegance of expression.
One or two qualifications alone do not complete the gentleman; it must be a union of many; and graceful speaking is as essential as gracefulness of person. Every man cannot be a harmonious speaker; a roughness or coarseness of voice may prevent it; but if there are no natural imperfections, if a man does not stammer or lisp, or has not lost his teeth, he may speak gracefully; nor will all these defects, if he has a mind to it, prevent him from speaking correctly.

Nobody can attend with pleasure to a bad speaker. One who tells his story ill, be it ever so important, will tire even the most patient. If you have been present at the performance of a good tragedy, you have doubtless been sensible of the good effects of a speech.
speech well delivered; how much it has interested and affected you; and on the contrary how much an ill spoken one has disgusted you. 'Tis the same in common conversation: He who speaks deliberately, distinctly, and correctly; he who makes use of the best words to express himself, and varies his voice according to the nature of the subject, will always please, while the thick or hasty speaker, he who mumbles out a set of ill chosen words, utters them ungrammatically, or with a dull monotony, will tire and disgust. Be assured, then, the air, the gesture, the looks of a speaker, a proper accent, a just emphasis, and tuneful cadence, are full as necessary to please, and be attended to, as the subject matter itself.
People may talk what they will of solid reasoning and sound sense; without the graces and ornaments of language, they will neither please nor persuade. In common discourse, even trifles elegantly expressed will be better received than the best of arguments homespun and unadorned.

A good way to acquire a graceful utterance is to read aloud to some friend every day, and beg of him to set you right, in case you read too fast, do not observe the proper stops, lay a wrong emphasis, or utter your words indistinctly. You may even read aloud to yourself, where such a friend is not at hand, and you will find your own ear a good corrector. Take care to open your teeth when you read or speak, and articulate every word distinctly.
distinctly; which last cannot be done, but by sounding the final letter. But above all, endeavour to vary your voice according to the matter, and avoid a monotony. By a daily attention to this, it will, in a little time, become easy and habitual to you.

Pay an attention also to your looks and your gesture, when talking, even on the most trifling subjects; things appear very different according as they are expressed, looked, and delivered.

Now, if it is necessary to attend so particularly to our manner of speaking, it is much more so with respect to the matter. Fine turns of expression, a genteel and correct style, are ornaments as requisite to common sense, as polite behaviour and an elegant address, dress are to common good manners; they are great assistants in the point of pleasing. A gentleman, it is true, may be known in the meanest garb; but it admits not of a doubt, that he would be better received into good company, genteelly and fashionably dressed, than was he to appear in dirt and tatters.

Be careful, then, of your style upon all occasions; whether you write or speak, study for the best words and best expressions, even in common conversation or the most familiar letters. This will prevent your speaking in a hurry, than which nothing is more vulgar; though you may be a little embarrassed at first, time and use will render it easy. It is no such difficult thing to express ourselves well on subjects we are thoroughly thoroughly acquainted with, if we think before we speak; and no one should presume to do otherwise. When you have said a thing, if you did not reflect before be fire to do it afterwards: Consider with yourself, whether you could not have expressed yourself better; and if you are in doubt of the propriety or elegancy of any word, search for it in some dictionary,* or some good author, while you remember it: Never be sparing of your trouble while you would wish to improve, and my word for it, a very little time will make this matter habitual.

In order to speak grammatically, ally, and to express yourself pleasingly, I would recommend it to you to translate often, any language you are acquainted with, into English, and to correct such translation, till the words, their order, and the periods, are agreeable to your own ear.

Vulgarism in language is another distinguishing mark of bad company and education. Expressions may be correct in themselves, and yet be vulgar owing to their not being fashionable, for language, as manners, are both established by the usage of people of fashion.

The conversation of a low bred man is filled up with proverbs and hackneyed sayings. Instead of observing that tastes are different, and that most men have one peculiar to themselves, he
he will give you, "What is one man's meat is another man's poison;" or "Every one to their liking, as the old woman said when she kissed her cow." He has ever some favourite word, which he lugs in upon all occasions, right or wrong; such as vastly angry, vastly kind; devilish ugly, devilish handsome; immensely great, immensely little. Even his pronunciation carries the mark of vulgarity along with it; he calls the earth, yeart; finances, fin'ances: he goes to wards, and not towards such a place. He affects to use hard words, to give him the appearance of a man of learning, but frequently mistakes their meaning, and seldom, if ever, pronounces them properly.

All this must be avoided, if you you would not be supposed to have kept company with footmen and housemaids. Never have recourse to proverbial or vulgar sayings; use neither favourite nor hard words, but seek for the most elegant; be careful in the management of them, and depend on it your labour will not be lost; for nothing is more engaging than a fashionable and polite address.

ADDRESS, PHRASEOLOGY, AND SMALL TALK.

In all good company, we meet with a certain manner, phraseology, and general conversation, that distinguishes the man of fashion. This can only be acquired by frequenting good company, pany, and being particularly attentive to all that passes there.

When invited to dine or to sup at the house of any well-bred man, observe how he does the honours of his table, and mark his manner of treating his company.

Attend to the compliments of congratulation or condolence that he pays; and take notice of his address to his superiors, his equals, and his inferiors; nay his very looks and tone of voice are worth your attention, for we cannot please without a union of them all.

There is a certain distinguishing diction that marks the man of fashion, a certain language of conversation that every gentleman should be master of. Saying to a man just married, "I wish you joy," or to one who has lost his wife, "I am sorry for your loss," and and both perhaps with an unmeaning countenance, may be civil, but it is nevertheless vulgar. A man of fashion will express the same thing more elegantly, and with a look of sincerity, that shall attract the esteem of the person he speaks to. He will advance to the one with warmth and cheerfulness, and perhaps squeezing him by the hand, will say, "Believe me, my dear sir, I have scarce words, to express the joy I feel, upon your happy alliance with such or such a family, &c." To the other, in affliction he will advance slower, and with a peculiar composure of voice and countenance, begin his compliments of condolence with "I hope, Sir, you will do me the justice to be persuaded that I am not insensible of your unhappiness, that I take part in your distress, tress, and shall ever be affected when you are so."

Your first address to, and indeed all your conversation with your superiors, should be open, cheerful, and respectful; with your equals, warm and animated; with your inferiors, hearty, free, and unreserved.

There is a fashionable kind of small talk, which, however trifling it may be thought, has its use in mixed companies: Of course you should endeavour to acquire it. By small talk I mean a good deal to say on unimportant matters; for example, foods, the flavour and growth of wines, and the chit chat of the day. Such conversation will serve to keep off serious subjects, that might sometimes create disputes. This chit chat is chiefly to be learned by by frequenting the company of the ladies.

OBSERVATION.

As the art of pleasing is to be learnt only by frequenting the best companies, we must endeavour to pick it up in such companies, by observation; for it is not sense and knowledge alone that will acquire esteem; these certainly are the first and necessary foundations for pleasing, but they will by no means do, unless attended with manners and attentions.

There have been people who have frequented the first companies all their lifetime, and yet have never got rid of their natural stiffness and awkwardness; but have continued as vulgar as if they were never out of a servant's hall; this has been owing to carelessness, and a want of attention to the manners and behaviour of others.

There are a great many people likewise who busy themselves the whole day, and who in fact do nothing. They have possibly taken up a book for two or three hours, but from a certain inattention that grows upon them, the more it is indulged, know no more of the contents than if they had not looked into it; nay, it is impossible for any one to retain what he reads, unless he reflects and reasons upon it as he goes on. When they have thus lounged away an hour or two, they will saunter into company, without attending to any thing that passes there; there; but if they think at all, are thinking of some trifling matter that ought not to occupy their attention; thence perhaps they go to the play, where they stare at the company and the lights, without attending to the piece, the very thing they went to see. In this manner they wear away their hours, that might otherwise be employed to their improvement and advantage. This silly suspension of thought they would pass for absence of mind—ridiculous! Wherever you are, let me recommend it to you to pay an attention to all that passes; observe the characters of the persons you are with, and the subjects of their conversation; listen to everything that is said, see everything that is done, and according to the vulgar vulgar saying, have your eyes and your ears about you.

A continual inattention to matters that occur, is the characteristic of a weak mind; the man who gives way to it is little else than a trifler, a blank in society, which every sensible person overlooks: Surely what is worth doing, is worth doing well, and nothing can be well done, if not properly attended to. When I hear a man say, on being asked about any thing that was said or done in his presence, "that truly he did not mind it," I am ready to knock the fool down. Why did not he mind it? What else had he to do? A man of sense and fashion never makes use of this paltry plea, he never complains of a treacherous memory, but attends to and remembers every thing that is either said or done. Whenever, then, you go into good company, that is, the company of people of fashion, observe carefully their behaviour, their address and their manner; imitate it as far as is in your power. Your attention, if possible, should be so ready as to observe every person in the room at once, their motions, their looks, and their turns of expression, and that without staring or seeming to be an observer.—This kind of observation may be acquired by care and practice, and will be found of the utmost advantage to you in the course of life.
Having mentioned absence of mind, let me be more particular concerning it.

What the world calls an absent man is generally either a very affected one or a very weak one; but whether weak or affected, he is in company a very disagreeable man. Lost in thought, or possibly in no thought at all, he is a stranger to every one present, and to every thing that passes; he knows not his best friends, is deficient in every act of good manners, unobservant of the actions of the company and insensible to his own. His answers are quite the reverse of what they ought to be: Talk to him of one thing, he replies as of of another. He forgets what he said last, leaves his hat in one room, his cane in another, and his sword in a third; nay, if it was not for his buckles, he would even leave his shoes behind him. Neither his arms nor his legs seem to be a part of his body, and his head is never in its right position. He joins not in the general conversation, except it be by fits and starts, as if awaking from a dream: I attribute this either to weakness or affectation. His shallow mind is possibly not able to attend to more than one thing at a time; or he would be supposed wrapped up in the investigation of some very important matter. Such men as Sir Isaac Newton, or Mr. Locke, might occasionally have some excuse for absence of mind; it might proceed ceed from that intenseness of thought that was necessary at all times for the scientific subjects they were studying; but for a young man, and a man of the world, who has no such plea to make, absence of mind is a rudeness to the company, and deserves the severest censure.

However insignificant a company may be; however trifling their conversation; while you are with them, do not show them by an inattention that you think them trifling; that can never be the way to please, but rather fall in with their weakness, than otherwise, for to mortify or show the least contempt to those we are in company with, is the greatest rudeness we can be guilty of, and what few can forgive.

I never yet found a man inattentive tentive to the person he feared, or the woman he loved; which convinces me, that absence of mind is to be got the better of, if we think proper to make the trial; and believe me, it is always worth the attempt.

Absence of mind is a tacit declaration, that those we are in company with, are not worth attending to; and, What can be a greater affront? Besides, Can an absent man improve by what is said or done in his presence? No—He may frequent the best companies for years together, and all to no purpose. In short, a man is neither fit for business nor conversation unless he can attend to the object before him, be that object what it will.
A knowledge of the world, by our own experience and observation, is so necessary, that without it, we shall act very absurdly, and frequently give offence, when we do not mean it. All the learning and parts in the world will not secure us from it. Without an acquaintance with life, a man may say very good things, but time them so ill, and address them so improperly, that he had much better be silent. Full of himself, and his own business, and inattentive to the circumstances and situations of those he converses with, he vents it without the least discretion, says things that he ought not to say, confuses some some, shocks others, and puts the whole company in pain, lest what he utters next, should prove worse than the last. The best direction I can give you in this matter, is rather to fall in with the conversation of others, than start a subject of your own; rather strive to put them more in conceit with themselves, than to draw their attention to you.

A novice in life, he who knows little of mankind, but what he collects from books, lays it down as a maxim, that most men love flattery; in order therefore to please, he will flatter. But, How? Without regard either to circumstances or occasion. Instead of those delicate touches, those soft tints, that serve to heighten the piece, he lays on his colours with a heavy hand, and daubs daubs where he means to adorn; in other words, he will flatter so unseasonably, and at the same time so grossly, that while he wishes to please he puts out of countenance, and is sure to offend. On the contrary, a man of the world, one who has made life his study, knows the power of flattery as well as he; but then, he knows how to apply it; he watches the opportunity, and does it indirectly, by inference, comparison, and hint.

Man is made up of such a variety of matter, that to search him thoroughly requires time and attention; for, though we are all made of the same materials, and have all the same passions, yet, from a difference in their proportion and combination, we vary in our dispositions; what is agreeable able to one is disagreeable to another, and what one shall approve, another shall condemn. Reason is given us to control these passions, but seldom does it. Application therefore to the reason of any man, will frequently prove ineffectual, unless we endeavour at the same time to gain his heart.

Wherever then you are, search into the character of men: find out, if possible their foible, their governing passion, or their particular merit; take them on their weak side, and you will generally succeed; their prevailing vanity you may readily discover, by observing their favourite topic of conversation, for every one talks most, of what he would be thought most to excel in.

The time should also be judiciously made choice of. Every man has his particular times when he may be applied to with success, the mollia tempora fandi; but these times are not all day long; they must be found out, watched and taken advantage of. You could not hope for success in applying to a man about one business, when he was taken up with another, or when his mind was affected with excess of grief, anger, or the like.

You cannot judge of other men's minds better than by studying your own; for though some men have one foible, and another has another, yet men in general are very much alike. Whatever pleases or offends you, will in similar circumstances, please or offend others; if you find your-

selt hurt when another makes you feel his superiority, you will certainly upon the common rule of right, Do as you would be done by, take care not to let another feel your superiority, if you have it; especially if you wish to gain his interest or esteem. If disagreeable insinuations, open contradictions or oblique shafts, vex and anger you, would you use them where you wished to please? Certainly not. Observe then, with care, the operations of your own mind and you may, in a great measure, read all mankind.

I will allow that one bred up in a cloister or college, may reason well on the structure of the human mind; he may investigate the nature of man, and give a tolerable account of his head, his heart, his passions, and his sentiments: but at the same time he may know nothing of him; he has not lived with him, and of course knows but little how those sentiments or those passions will work.—He must be ignorant of the various prejudices, propensities and antipathies that always bias him and frequently determine him. His knowledge is acquired only from theory, which differs widely from practice; and if he forms his judgment from that alone, he must be often deceived; whereas a man of the world, one who collects his knowledge from his own experience and observation, is seldom wrong, he is well acquainted with the operations of the human mind, pries into the heart of man, reads his words, before before they are uttered; sees his actions, before they are performed; knows what will please and what will displease, and foresees the event of most things.

Labour then to acquire this intuitive knowledge; attend carefully to the addresses, the arts and manners of those acquainted with life, and endeavour to imitate them. Observe the means they take, to gain the favour and conciliate the affections of those they associate with; pursue those means, and you will soon gain the esteem of all that know you.

How often have we seen men governed by persons very much their inferiors in point of understanding, and even without their knowing it? A proof that some men have more worldly dexterity than than others; they find out the weak and unregarded part, make their attack there, and the man surrenders.

Now from a knowledge of mankind we shall learn the advantage of two things, the command of our temper and our countenances; a trifling disagreeable incident shall perhaps anger one unacquainted with life, or confound him with shame; shall make him rave like a madman, or look like a fool; but a man of the world will never understand what he cannot or ought not to resent. If he should chance to make a slip himself, he will stifle his confusion, and turn it off with a jest; recovering it with coolness.

Many people have sense enough to
to keep their own secrets; but from being unused to a variety of company, have unfortunately such a tell-tale countenance, as involuntarily declares what they would with to conceal. This is a great unhappiness, and should, as soon as possible be got the better of.

That coolness of mind and evenness of countenance, which prevents a discovery of our sentiments, by our words, our actions, or our looks, is too necessary to pass unnoticed. A man who cannot hear displeasing things, without visible marks of anger or uneasiness; or pleasing one's without a sudden burst of joy, a cheerful eye, or an expanded face, is at the mercy of every knave, for either they will designedly please or provoke you themselves to catch your unguarded looks, or they will seize the opportunity thus to read your very heart, when any other shall do it. You may possibly tell me, that this coolness must be natural, for if not, you can never acquire it. I will admit the force of constitution, but people are very apt to blame that for many things they might readily avoid. Care with a little reflection, will soon give you this mastery of your temper and your countenance. If you find yourself subject to sudden starts of passion determine with yourself not to utter a single word till your reason has recovered itself; and resolve to keep your countenance as unmoved as possible. As a man who at a card table can preserve a serenity in his looks, under good or bad luck, has considerably the advantage of one who appears elated with success, or cast down with ill fortune, from our being able to read his cards in his face, so the man of the world, having to deal with one of those babbling countenances, will take care to profit by the circumstance, let the consequence, to him with whom he deals be as injurious as it may.

In the course of life, we shall find it necessary very often to put on a pleasing countenance, when we are exceedingly displeased; we must frequently seem friendly when we are quite otherwise. I am sensible it is difficult to accost a man with smiles whom we know to be our enemy: but what is to be done? On receiving an affront if you cannot be justified in knocking the offender down, you must not notice the offence; for, in the eye of the world taking an affront calmly is considered as cowardice.

If fools should attempt at any time to be witty upon you, the best way is not to know their witticisms are leveled at you, but to conceal any uneasiness it may give you, but should they be so plain that you cannot be thought ignorant of their meaning, I would recommend, rather than quarrel with the company, joining even in the laugh against yourself: allow the jest to be a good one, and take it in seeming good humour. Never attempt to retaliate the same way, as that would imply you were hurt. Should what is said wound your honor or your moral character there is but one proper reply, PLY, which I hope you will never be obliged to have recourse to.

Remember there are but two alternatives for a gentleman; extreme politeness, or the sword. If a man openly and designedly affronts you, call him out; but, if it does not amount to an open insult, be outwardly civil; if this does not make him ashamed of his behaviour, it will prejudice every bystander in your favour, and instead of being disgraced, you will come off with honour. Politeness to those we do not respect, is no more a breach of faith, than your humble servant at the bottom of a challenge; they are universally understood to be things of courte.

Wrangling and quarrelling are characteristic of a weak mind; leave leave that to the women, be you always above it. Enter into no sharp contest, and pride yourself, in shewing, if possible, more civility to your antagonist than to any other in company; this will infallibly bring over all the laughers to your side, and the person you are contending with will be very likely to confess you have behaved very handsomely throughout the whole affair.

Experience will teach us that though all men consist principally of the same materials, as I before took notice, yet from a difference in their proportion, no two men are uniformly the same: we differ from one another, and we often differ from ourselves, that is, we sometimes do things utterly inconsistent with the general tenor of of our characters. The wisest man may occasionally do a weak thing; the most honest man, a wrong thing; the proudest man, a mean thing; and the worst of men will sometimes do a good thing. On this account, our study of mankind should not be general; we should take a frequent view of individuals, and though we may upon the whole form a judgment of the man from his prevailing passion or his general character, yet it will be prudent not to determine till we have waited to see the operations of his subordinate appetites, and humours.

For example; and man's general character may be that of strictly honest. I would not dispute it, because, I would not be thought envious or malevolent; but I would would not rely upon his general character, so as to entrust him with my fortune or my life. Should this honest man, as is not uncommon, be my rival in power, interest, or love, he may possibly do things that in other circumstances he would abhor; and power, interest and love, let me tell you, will often put honesty to the severest trial, and frequently overpower it. I would then ransom this honest man to the bottom, if I wished to trust him, and as I found him, would place my confidence accordingly.

One of the greatest compositions in our nature is vanity, to which all men, more or less, give way. Women have an intolerable share of it. No flattery, no adulation is too gross for them;
those who flatter them most, please them best, and they are most in love with him who pretends to be most in love with them: and the least slight or contempt of them is never forgotten. It is, in some measure the same with men; they will sooner pardon an injury than an insult, and are more hurt by contempt than by ill usage. Tho' all men do not boast of superior talents, though they pretend not to the abilities of a Pope, a Newton, or a Bolingbroke, every one pretends to have common sense, and to discharge his office in life with decency; to arraign therefore, in any shape, his abilities or integrity in the department he holds, is an insult he will not readily forgive.

As I would not have you trust.
too implicitly to a man, because the world give him a good character, so I must particularly caution you against those why speak well of themselves. In general, suspect those who boast of or affect to have any one virtue above all others, for they are commonly impostors. There are exceptions however to this rule, for we hear of prudes that have been chaste, bullies that have been brave, and saints that have been religious. Conside only where your own observation shall direct you; observe not only what is said, but how it is said, and if you have any penetration, you may find out the truth better by your eyes than your ears; in short, never take a character upon common report, but enquire into it yourself; for common common report, though it is right in general, may be wrong in particulars.

Beware of those who on a slight acquaintance, make you a tender of their friendship, and seem to place a confidence in you; it is ten to one but they deceive and betray you; however do not rudely reject them upon such a supposition; you may be civil to them, though you do not entrust them. Silly men are apt to solicit your friendship, and unbosom themselves upon the first acquaintance; such a friend cannot be worth hearing, their friendship being as slender as their understanding; and if they proffer their friendship with a design to make a property of you, they are dangerous acquaintance indeed. Not but that the little friendships of the weak may be of some use to you, if you do not return the compliment; and it may not be amiss to seem to accept of those designing men, keeping them, as it were in play, that they may not be openly your enemies; for their enmity is the next dangerous thing to their friendship. We may certainly hold their vices in abhorrence, without being marked out as their personal enemy. The general rule is to have a real reserve with almost every one, and a seeming reserve with almost no one; for it is very disgusting to seem reserved, and dangerous not to be so. Few observe the true medium. Many are ridiculously mysterious upon trifles, and many indiscreetly communicative of all they know.
There is a kind of short-lived friendship that takes place among young men, from a connection in their pleasures only; a friendship too often attended with bad consequences. This companion of your pleasures, young and unexperienced, will probably, in the heat of convivial mirth vow a perpetual friendship, and unfold himself to you without the least reserve; but new associations, change of fortune, or change of place, may soon break this ill tim'd connection and an improper use may be made of it. Be one, if you will, in young companies, and bear your part like others in all the social festivity of youth; nay trust them with your innocent frolicks, but keep your serious matters to yourself; and if you must must at any time make them known, let it be to some tried friend of great experience; and that nothing may tempt him to become your rival, let that friend be in a different walk of life from yourself.

Were I to hear a man making strong protestations and swearing to the truth of a thing, that is in itself probable and very likely to be, I should doubt his veracity; for when he takes such pains to make me believe it, it cannot be with a good design.

There is a certain easiness or false modesty in most young people, that either makes them unwilling, or ashamed to refuse any thing that is asked of them. There is also an unguarded openness about them that makes them the the ready prey of the artful and designing. They are easily led away by the feigned friendships of a knave or a fool, and too rashly place a confidence in them, that terminates in their loss, and frequently in their ruin. Beware, therefore, as I said before, of these proffered friendships; repay them with compliments, but not with confidence. Never let your vanity make you suppose that people become your friends upon a slight acquaintance; for good offices must be shewn on both sides to create a friendship: it will not thrive, unless its love be mutual: and it requires time to ripen it.

There is still among young people another kind of friendship merely nominal; warm indeed for a time, but fortunately of no long long continuance. This friendship takes its rise from their pursuing the same course of riot and debauchery; their purses are open to each other, they tell one another all they know, they embark in the same quarrels, and stand by each other on all occasions. I should rather call this a confederacy against good morals and good manners, and think it deserves the severest lash of the law: but they have the impi-dence to call it friendship. However, it is as suddenly dissolved as it is hastily contracted; some accident disperses them and they presently forget each other, except it is to betray and to laugh at their own egregious folly.

In short, the sum of the whole is, to make a wide difference betwixt
tween companions and friends; for a very agreeable companion has often proved a very dangerous friend.

CHOICE of COMPANY.

THE next thing to the choice of friends is the choice of your company.

Endeavour as much as you can, to keep good company, and the company of your superiors; for you will be held in estimation according to the company you keep. By superiors, I do not mean so much with regard to birth, as merit, and the light in which they are considered by the world.

There are two sorts of good company company, the one consist of persons of birth, rank, and fashion; the other of those who are distinguished by some peculiar merit, in any liberal art or science, as men of letters, &c. and a mixture of these, is what I would have understood by good company: for it is not what particular sets of people shall call themselves, but what the people in general acknowledge to be so, and are the accredited good company of the place.

Now and then persons without either birth, rank, or character, will creep into good company, under the protection of some considerable personage; but, in general, none are admitted of mean degree or infamous moral character.

In this fashionable good company
pany alone, can you learn the best manners and the best language: for, as there is no legal standard to form them by, it is here they are established.

It may possibly be questioned, whether a man has it always in his power to get into good company; undoubtedly, by deserving it, he has, provided he is in circumstances which enable him to live and appear in the stile of a gentleman. Knowledge, modesty and good-breeding, will endear him to all that see him; for without politeness, the scholar is no better than a pedant, the philosopher than a cynic, the soldier than a brute, nor any man than a clown.

Though the company of men of learning and genius is highly to be valued and occasionally coveted, ed, I would by no means have you always found in such company. As they do not live in the world, they cannot have that easy manner and address which I would wish you to acquire. If you can bear a part in such company, it is certainly advisable to be in it sometimes, and you will be the more esteemed in other company by being so; but let it not engross you, lest you should be considered as one of the literati, which however respectable in name, is not the way to rise or shine in the fashionable world.

But the company which, of all others, you should carefully avoid, is that, which in every sense of the words may be called low: low in birth, low in rank, low in parts, and low in manners; that company, pany, who, insignificant and contemptible in themselves, think it an honor to be seen with you, and who will flatter your follies, nay your very vices, to keep you with them.

Though you may think such a caution unnecessary, I do not; for many a young gentleman of sense and rank, has been led by his vanity to keep such company 'till he has been degraded, vilified and undone.

The vanity I mean is that of being the first of the company. This pride, though too common, is idle to the last degree. Nothing in the world lets a man down so much. For the sake of dictating, being applauded and admired by this low company, he is disgraced and disqualified for better.
Depend upon it, in the estimation of mankind, you will sink or rise to the level of the company you keep.

Be it then, your ambition to get into the best company; and, when there, imitate their virtues, but not their vices. You have, no doubt, often heard of genteel and fashionable vices. These are whoring, drinking and gaming. It has happened that some men, even with these vices, have been admired and esteemed. Understand this matter rightly it is not their vices for which they are admired; but for some accomplishments they at the same time possess; for their parts, their learning or their good-breeding. Be assured, were they free from their vices, they would be much more esteemed.
In these mixed characters, the bad part is overlooked, for the sake of the good.

Should you be unfortunate enough to have any vices of your own, add not to their number by adopting the vices of others. Vices of adoption are of all others the most unpardonable, for they have not inadvertency to plead. If people had no vices but their own, few would have so many as they have.

Imitate, then, only the perfections you meet with; copy the politeness, the address, the easy manners of well bred people; and remember, let them shine ever so bright, if they have any vices they are so many blemishes, which it would be as ridiculous to imitate, as it would, to make an artificial wart.
wart upon one's face, because some very handsome man had the misfortune to have a natural one upon his.

LAUGHTER.

L E T us now descend to minute matters, which though not so important as those we have mentioned are still far from inconsiderable. Of these laughter is one.

Frequent and loud laughter is a sure sign of a weak mind, and no less characteristic of a low education. It is the manner in which low-bred men express their silly joy, at silly things, and they call it being merry.

I do
I do not recommend upon all occasions a solemn countenance. A man may smile, but if he would be thought a gentleman and a man of sense, he would by no means laugh. True wit never made a man of fashion laugh; he is above it. It may create a smile, but as loud laughter shews, that a man has not the command of himself, every one, who would wish to appear sensible must abhor it.

A man's going to sit down, on a supposition that he has a chair behind him, and falling for want of one, occasions a general laugh, when the best pieces of wit could not do it; a sufficient proof how how low and unbecoming laughter is.

Besides, could the immoderate laughter hear his own noife, or see the faces he makes, he would despire himself for his folly. Laughter being generally supposed to be the effect of gaiety, its absurdity is not properly attended to; but a little reflection will easily restrain it, and when you are told, it is a mark of low breeding, I persuade myself you will endeavour to avoid it.

Some people have a silly trick of laughing, whenever they speak; so that they are always on the grin, and their faces ever distorted. This and a thousand other tricks, such as scratching their heads, twirling their hats, fumbling with their button, playing with their fingers, &c. &c. are acquired from a false modesty at their first outlet in life. Being shame-faced in company, they try a variety of ways to keep themselves felves in countenance; thus, they fall into those awkward habits I have mentioned, which grow upon them, and in time become habitual.

Nothing is more repugnant likewise to good-breeding than horse play of any sort, romping, throwing things at one another's heads, and to on. They may pass well enough with the mob, but they lessen and degrade the gentleman.
SUNDRY LITTLE ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

I have had reason to observe before, that various little matters, apparently trifling in themselves, conspire to form the whole of pleasing, as, in a well finished portrait, a variety of colours combine to complete the piece. It not being necessary to dwell much upon them, I shall content myself, with just mentioning them as they occur.

1. To do the honours of a table gracefully, is one of the outlines of a well bred man; and to carve well, is an article, little as it may seem, that is useful twice every day, and the doing of which ill, is not only troublesome to one's one's self, but renders us disagreeable and ridiculous to others. We are always in pain for a man, who instead of cutting up a fowl gently, is hacking for half an hour across the bone, greasing himself and bespattering the company with the sauce. Use, with a little attention, is all that is requisite to acquit yourself well in this particular.

2. To be well received, you must, also pay some attention to your behaviour at table, where it is exceedingly rude to scratch any part of your body, to spit, or blow your nose, if you can possibly avoid it, to eat speedily, to lean your elbows on the table, to pick your teeth before the dishes are removed, or to leave the table before grace is said.

3. Drinking
3. Drinking of healths is now growing out of fashion, and is very unpolite in good company. Custom had once made it universal, but the improved manners of the age now render it vulgar. What can be more rude or ridiculous than to interrupt persons at their meals, with an unnecessary compliment? Abstain then from this silly custom where you find it not of use; and use only at those tables where it continues general.

4. A polite manner of refusing to comply with the solicitations of a company, is also very necessary to be learnt; for, a young man, who seems to have no view of his own, but does every thing that is asked of him, may be a very good natured fellow, but he is a very silly one. If you are invited to drink, drink at any man's house, more than you think is wholesome, you may say, "you wish you could, "but that so little makes you both "drunk and sick; that you should "only be bad company by doing "it: of course beg to be excus-"ed." If desired to play at cards deeper than you would, refuse it ludicrously; tell them, "if you "were sure to lose, you might "possibly sit down; but that as "fortune may be favourable, you "dread the thought of having too "much money, ever since you "found what an incumbrance it was. "to poor Harlequin, and there-"fore you are resolved never to "put yourself in the way of win-"ning more than such or such a "sum a day." This light way of declining invitations to vice and folly is more becoming a young man than philosophical or sententious refusals, which would only be laughed at.

5. Now I am on the subject of cards, I must not omit mentioning the necessity of playing them well and genteelly, if you would be thought to have kept good company. I would by no means recommend playing of cards as a part of your study, lest you should grow too fond of it, and the consequence prove bad. It were better not to know a diamond from a club, than to become a gambler; but as custom has introduced innocent card playing at most friendly meetings, it marks the gentleman to handle them genteelly, and play them well; and as I hope you will play only for small sums, fums, should you lose your money pray lose it with temper; or win, receive your winnings without either elation or greediness.

6. To write well and correct, and in a pleasing style, is another part of polite education. Every man who has the use of his eyes and his right hand can write whatever hand he pleases. Nothing is so illiberal as a school-boy's scrawl, I would not have you learn a stiff formal hand writing, like that of a school-master, but a genteel, legible and liberal hand, and to be able to write quick. As to the correctness and elegance of your writing, attention to grammar does the one, and to the best authors, the other. Epistolary correspondence should not be carried on in a studied or affected style, but the language should flow from the pen, as naturally and as easily as it would from the mouth. In short a letter should be penned in the same stile, as you would talk to your friend if he were present.

7. If writing well shews the gentleman, much more so does spelling well. It is so essentially necessary for a gentleman, or a man of letters, that one false spelling may fix a ridicule on him for the remainder of his life. Words in books are generally well spelled, according to the orthography of the age; reading, therefore, with attention, will teach every one to spell right. It sometimes happens that words shall be spelled differently by different authors; but if you spell them upon the authority of one in estimation of the the public, you will escape ridicule. Where there is but one way of spelling a word, by your spelling it wrong you will be sure to be laughed at. For a woman of a tolerable education would laugh at and despise her lover, if he wrote to her, and the words were ill spelled. Be particularly attentive then to your spelling.

8. There is nothing that a young man, at his first appearance in life, ought more to dread, than having any ridicule fixed on him. In the estimation, even of the most rational men, it will lessen him, but ruin him with all the rest. Many a man has been undone by a ridiculous nick-name. The causes of nick-names among well-bred men, are generally the little defects in manner, air, or address.
address. To have the appellation of ill-bred, awkward, muttering, left-legged, or any other tacked always to your name, would injure you more than you are aware of; avoid then these little defects (and they are easily avoided) and you need never fear a nick-name.

9. Some young men are apt to think, that they cannot be complete gentlemen, without becoming men of pleasure; and the rake they often mistake for the man of pleasure. A rake is made up of the meanest and most disgraceful vices. They all combine to degrade his character and ruin his health and fortune. A man of pleasure will refine upon the enjoyments of the age, attend them with decency and partake of them becomingly. Indeed, he is too often often less scrupulous than he should be, and frequently has cause to repent it. A man of pleasure, at best, is but a dissipated being, and what the rational part of mankind must abhor; I mention it, however, left in taking up the man of pleasure, you should fall into the rake: for of two evils alway choose the least. A dissolute, flagitious footman may make as good a rake as a man of the first quality. Few men can be men of pleasure; every man may be a rake. There is a certain dignity that should be preserved in all our pleasures; in love a man may lose his heart, without losing his nose; at table a man may have a distinguishing palate, without being a glutton; he may love wine without being a drunkard; he may game without being a gambler; and so on. Every virtue has its kindred vice, and every pleasure its neighboring disgrace. Temperance and moderation mark the gentleman; but excess the blackguard. Attend carefully, then, to the line that divides them; and remember, stop rather a yard short, than step an inch beyond it. Weigh the present enjoyment of your pleasures against the necessary consequences of them, and I will leave you to your own determination.

10. A gentleman has ever some regard also to the choice of his amusements, if at cards, he will not be seen at cribbage, all fours, or put; or, in sports of exercise, at skittles, foot-ball, leap-frog, cricket, driving of coaches, &c. but will preserve a propriety in every every part of his conduct; knowing that any imitation of the manners of the mob, will unavoidably stamp him with vulgarity. There is another amulement too, which I cannot help calling illiberal, that is playing upon any musical instrument. Music is commonly reckoned one of the liberal arts, and undoubtedly is so; but to be piping or fiddling at a concert is degrading to a man of fashion. If you love music, hear it: pay fiddlers to play to you, but never fiddle yourself. It makes a gentleman appear frivolous and contemptible, leads him frequently into bad company, and wastes that time which might otherwise be well employed.

11. Secrecy is another characteristic of good-breeding. Be careful careful never to tell in one company what you see or hear in another; much less to divert the present company at the expense of the last. Things apparently indifferent may when often repeated and told abroad, have much more serious consequences than imagined. In conversation, there is generally a tacit reliance, that what is said will not be repeated; and a man, though not enjoined to secrecy, will be excluded company, if found to be a tattler; besides, he will draw himself into a thousand scrapes, and every one will be afraid to speak before him.

12. Pulling out your watch in company unasked, either at home or abroad is a mark of ill-breeding; if at home, it appears as if you were tired of your company pany, and wished them to be gone; if abroad as if the hours dragged heavily and you wished to be gone yourself. If you want to know the time, withdraw; besides, as the taking what is called a French leave was introduced, that on one person's leaving the company the rest might not be disturbed, looking at your watch does what that piece of politeness was designed to prevent; it is a kind of dictating to all present, and telling them it is time, or almost time to break up.

13. Among other things, let me caution you against ever being in a hurry; a man of sense may be in haste but he is never in a hurry; convinced that hurry is the surest way to make him do what he undertakes ill. To be in a hurry is a proof that the business we embark in is too great for us; of course it is the mark of little minds, that are puzzled and perplexed, when they should be cool and deliberate; they wish to do nothing. Be steady, then, in all your engagements; look round you, before you begin; and remember that you had better do half of them well, and leave the rest undone, than to do the whole indifferently.

14. From a kind of false modesty, most young men are apt to consider familiarity as unbecoming. Forwardness I allow is so; but there is a decent familiarity that is necessary in the course of life. Mere formal visits, upon formal invitations are not the thing; they create no connection, nor will they prove of service to you; it is the careless careless and easy ingress and egress, at all hours, that secures an acquaintance to our interest, and this is acquired by a respectful familiarity entered into, without forfeiting your consequence.

15. In acquiring new acquaintance, be careful not to neglect your old, for a flight of this kind is seldom forgiven. If you cannot be with your former acquaintance so often as you used to be, while you had no others, take care not to give them cause to think you neglect them; call upon them frequently, tho' you cannot stay long with them; tell them you are sorry to leave them so soon, and nothing should take you away but certain engagements which good manners oblige you to attend to; for it will be your interest to make all

all the friends you can, and as few enemies as possible. By friends, I would not be understood to mean confidential ones; but persons who speak of you respectfully, and who, consistent with their own interest, would wish to be of service to you, and would rather do you good than harm.

16. Another thing I must recommend to you, as characteristic of a polite education, and of having kept good company, is a graceful manner of conferring favours. The most obliging things may be done so awkwardly as to offend, while the most disagreeable things may be done so agreeably as to please.

17. A few more articles of general advice, and I have done; the first is on the subject of vanity.
ty. It is the common failing of youth, and as such ought to be carefully guarded against, the vanity I mean, is that which, if given way to, stamps a man a coxcomb, a character he will find a difficulty to get rid of perhaps as long as he lives. Now this vanity shews itself in a variety of shapes; one man shall pride himself in taking the lead in all conversations, and peremptorily deciding upon every subject; another, desirous of appearing successful among the women, shall insinuate the encouragement he has met with, the conquests he makes, and perhaps boast of favours he never received: if he speaks truth he is ungenerous: if false, he is a villain: but whether true or false, he defeats his own purposes, overthrows the reputation tion he wishes to erect, and draws upon himself contempt in the room of respect. Some men are vain enough to think they acquire consequence by alliance, or by an acquaintance with persons of distinguished character or abilities; hence they are eternally talking of their grandfather, Lord such-a-one; or their kinsman, Sir William such-a-one; or their intimate friend, Doctor such-a-one, with whom perhaps, they are scarce acquainted. If they are ever found out (and that they are sure to be, one time or other) they become ridiculous and contemptible: but even admitting what they say to be true, what then? A man's intrinsic merit does not rise from an ennobled alliance, or a reputable acquaintance. A rich man never borrows.

borrows. When angling for praise, modesty is the surest bait. If we would wish to shine in any particular character, we must never affect that character. An affectation of courage will make a man pass for a bully; an affectation of wit, for a coxcomb; and an affectation of sense for a fool. Not that I would recommend bashfulness or timidity: no; I would have every one know his own value, yet not discover that he knows it, but leave his merit to be found out by others.

18. Another thing worth your attention is, if in company with an inferior not to let him feel his inferiority; if he discovers it himself without your endeavours, the fault is not yours, and he will not blame you; but if you take pains to to mortify him, or to make him feel himself inferior to you in abilities, fortune, or rank, it is an insult that will not readily be forgiven. In point of abilities, it would be unjust, as they are out of his power; in point of rank or fortune, it is ill-natured and ill-bred. This rule is never more necessary than at table, where there cannot be a greater insult than to help an inferior to a part he dislikes, or a part that may be worse than ordinary, and to take the best to yourself. If you at any time invite an inferior to your table, you put him during the time he is there, upon an equality with you, and it is an act of the highest rudeness to treat him in any respect, slightingly. I would rather double my attention to such a person; person, and treat him with additional respect, lest he should even suppose himself neglected. There cannot be a greater savageness or cruelty, or any thing more degrading to a man of fashion than to put upon or take unbecoming liberties with him, whose modesty, humility or respect will not suffer him to retaliate. True politeness consists in making everybody happy about you; and as to mortify is to render unhappy, it can be nothing but the worst of breeding. Make it a rule, rather to flatter a person’s vanity than otherwise; make him if possible, more in love with himself, and you will be certain to gain his esteem; never tell him anything he may not like to hear, nor say things that will put him out of countenance, nance, but let it be your study on all occasions to please; this will be making friends instead of enemies, and be a means of serving yourself in the end.

19. Never be witty, at the expense of any one present, nor gratify that idle inclination which is too strong in most young men, I mean laughing at or ridiculing the weaknesses or infirmities of others, by way of diverting the company, or displaying your own superiority. Most people have their weaknesses, their peculiar likings and aversions. Some cannot bear the sight of a cat; others the smell of cheese and so on; was you to laugh at these men for their antipathies, or by design or inattention to bring them in their way, you could not insult them more. You may possibly possibly thus gain the laugh on your side, for the present, but it will make the person, perhaps, at whose expense you are merry your enemy for ever after; and even those who laugh with you, will on a little reflection, fear you and probably despise you: whereas to procure what one likes, and to remove what the other hates, would shew them that they were the objects of your attention, and possibly make them more your friends than much greater services would have done. If you have wit use it to please but not to hurt. You may shine, but take care not to scorch. In short, never seem to see the faults of others. Tho' among the mass of men there are doubtless, numbers of fools and knaves, yet were we to tell every one of these these we meet with, that we know them to be so, we should be in perpetual war. I would detest the knave and pity the fool, wherever I found him, but I would let neither of them know unnecessarily that I did so; as I would not be industrious to make myself enemies. As one must please others then, in order to be pleased one's self; consider what is agreeable to you, must be agreeable to them, and conduct yourself accordingly.

20. Whispering in company is another act of ill-breeding! it seems to insinuate either that the persons whom we would not wish should hear, are unworthy of our confidence, or it may lead them to suppose we are speaking improperly of them; on both accounts, therefore, abstain from it. 21. So
21. So pulling out one letter after another and reading them in company, or cutting or paring one's nails, is unpolite and rude. It seems to say, we are weary of the conversation, and are in want of some amusement to pass away the time.

22. Humming a tune to ourselves, drumming with our fingers on the table, making a noise with our feet, and such like, are all breaches of good manners, and indications of our contempt for the persons present; therefore they should not be indulged.

23. Walking fast in the streets is a mark of vulgarity, implying hurry of business; it may appear well in a mechanic or tradesman, but suits ill with the character of a gentleman or a man of fashion.

24. Staring
24. Staring at any person you meet full in the face, is an act also of ill breeding; it looks as if you saw something wonderful in his appearance, and is therefore a tacit reprehension.

25. Eating quick, or very low at meals, is a characteristic of the vulgar; the first infers poverty, that you have not had a good meal for some time; the last if abroad, that you dislike your entertainment; if at home, that you are rude enough to set before your friends what you cannot eat yourself. So again, eating your soup with your nose in the plate is vulgar; it has the appearance of being used to hard work, and of course an unsteady hand. If it be necessary then to avoid this, it is much more so that of smelling your meat.

26. Smell-
26. Smelling to the meat while on the fork, before you put it in your mouth. I have seen many an ill-bred fellow do this, and have been so angry, that I could have kicked him from the table. If you dislike what you have upon your plate, leave it; but on no account, by smelling to, or examining it, charge your friend with putting unwholesome provisions before you.

27. Spitting on the carpet is a nasty practice, and shocking in a man of liberal education. Was this to become general, it would be as necessary to change the carpets as the table cloths; besides it will lead our acquaintance to suppose that we have not been used to genteel furniture; for this reason reason alone, if for no other, by all means avoid it.

28. Keep yourself free likewise from odd tricks or habits, such as thrusting out your tongue, continually snapping your fingers, rubbing your hands, sighing aloud, an affected shivering of your whole body, gaping with a noise like a country fellow that has been sleeping in a hay-loft, or indeed with any noise, and many others, which I have noticed before; these are imitations of the manners of the mob, and are degrading to a gentleman.

A very little attention will get the better of all these ill-bred habits, and be assured, you will find your account in it.
EMPLOYMENT of TIME.

EMPLOYMENT of time, is a subject, that from its importance, deserves your best attention. Most young gentlemen have a great deal of time before them, and one hour well employed, in the early part of life is more valuable and will be of greater use to you, than perhaps four and twenty, some years to come. Whatever time you can steal from company and from the study of the world; (I say company, for a knowledge of life is best learned in various companies) employ it in serious reading. Take up some valuable book, and continue the reading of that book till you have got through it; never burden your mind with more than one thing at a time: and in reading this book don't run over it superfluously, but read every passage twice over, at least do not pass on to a second till you thoroughly understand the first, nor quit the book till you are master of the subject; for unless you do this, you may read it through, and not remember the contents of it for a week. The books I would particularly recommend, among others, are Cardinal Retz's maxims, Rochfaucault's Moral Reflections, Bruyere's characters, Fontenell's plurality of worlds, Sir Josias Child on Trade, Bolingbroke's works; for style, his Remarks on the history of England, under the name of Sir John Oldcastle; Puffendorff's Jus Gentium, and Grotius de Juri Belli et Pacis: the last are well translated by By beyrac, beyrac. For occasional half hours or less, read the best works of invention, wit, and humour; but never waste your minutes on trifling authors, either ancient or modern.

Any business you may have to transact, should be done the first opportunity, and finished, if possible without interruption, for by deferring it, we may probably finish it too late, or execute it indifferently. Now, business of any kind should never be done by halves, but every part of it should be well attended to; for he that does business ill, had better not do it at all. And, in any point which discretion bids you pursue, and which has a manifest utility to recommend it, let not difficulties deter you; rather let them animate your your industry. If one method fails try a second and a third. Be active, persevere and you will certainly conquer.

Never indulge a lazy disposition; there are few things but are attended with some difficulties, and if you are frightened at those difficulties, you will not complete any thing. Indolent minds prefer ignorance to trouble; they look upon the most things as impossible because perhaps they are difficult. Even an hours attention is too laborious for them, and they would rather content themselves with the first view of things, than take the trouble to look any further into them. Thus, when they come to talk upon subjects to those who have studied them, they betray an unpardonable ignorance, and lay themselves open to answers that confuse them. Be careful then, that you do not get the appellation of indolent; and, if possible, avoid the character of frivolous. For,

The frivolous mind is always busied upon nothing. It mistakes trifling objects for important ones, and spends that time upon little matters, that should only be bestowed upon great ones. Knicknacks, butterflies, shells, and such like engross the attention of the frivolous man, and fill up all his time. He studies the dress and not the characters of men, and his subjects of conversation are no other than the weather, his own domestic affairs, his servants, his method of managing his family, the little anecdotes of the neighborhood, borhood, and the fiddle-faddle stories of the day; void of information, void of improvement. Thence he relates with emphasis, as interesting matters; in short, he is a male gossip. I appeal to your own feelings now, whether such things do not lessen a man, in the opinion of his acquaintance, and instead of attracting esteem, create disgust.

DIGNITY OF MANNERS.

There is a certain dignity of manners, without which the very best characters will not be valued.

Rompimg, loud and frequent laughing, punning, joking, mimickry, ickry, waggery, and too great and indiscriminate familiarity will render any one contemptible, in spite of all his knowledge or his merit. These may constitute a merry fellow, but a merry fellow was never yet respectable. Indiscriminate familiarity will either offend your superiors, or make you pass for their dependent or toad eater, and it will put your inferiors on a degree of equality with you that may be troublesome.

A joke if it carries a sting along with it is no longer a joke, but an affront; and even if it has no sting, unless its witticism is delicate and facetious, instead of giving pleasure it will disgust; or if the company should laugh, they will probably laugh at the jester rather than the jest. Pun-Punning is a mere playing upon words, and far from being a mark of sense: thus were we to say such a dress is commodious one of these wags would answer odious; or, that, whatever it has been, it is now be-commodious. Others will give us an answer different from what we should expect, without either wit, or the least beauty of thought; as, "Where's my lord? In his cloths, unless he is in bed." "How does this wine taste?"—"A little moist, I think." "How is this to be eaten?" "With your mouth;" and so on, all which (you will readily apprehend) is low and vulgar. If your witticisms are not instantly approved by the laugh of the company, for heaven's sake, do not attempt to be witty for the future; for you may take it for granted granted, the defect is in yourself, and not in your hearers.

As to a mimick or a wag, he is little else than a buffoon, who will distort his mouth and his eyes to make people laugh. Be assured, no one person ever demeaned himself to please the rest, unless he wished to be thought the Merry-Andrew of the company, and whether this character is respectable, I will leave you to judge.

If a man's company is coveted on any other account than his knowledge, his good sense, or his manners, he is seldom respected by those who invite him, but made use of only to entertain. "Let's have such a-one, for he sings a good song, or he is always joking or laughing;" or "Let's send for such a-one, for for he is a good bottle companion;” these are degrading distinctions, that preclude all respect and esteem. Whoever is bad (as the phrase is) for the sake of any qualification singly, is merely that thing he is bad for, is never considered in any another light, and, of course, never properly respected, let his intrinsic merits be what they will.

You may possibly suppose this dignity of manner to border upon pride; but it differs as much from pride, as true courage from blustering.

To flatter a person right or wrong is abject flattery, and to consent readily to do every thing proposed by a company, be it silly or criminal is full as degrading as to dispute warmly upon every very subject, and to contradict upon all occasions. To preserve dignity, we should modestly assert our own sentiments, though we politely acquiesce in those of others.

So again, to support dignity of character, we should neither be frivolously curious about trifles, nor be laboriously intent upon little objects that deserve not a moments attention; for this implies an incapacity in matters of greater importance.

A great deal likewise depends upon our air, address and expressions; an awkward address and vulgar expressions, infer either a low turn of mind, or low education.

Insolent contempt, or low envy, is incompatible also with dignity.
nity of manners. Low bred persons, fortunately lifted in the world, in fine cloths and fine equipages, will insolently look down on all those who cannot afford to make as good an appearance, and they openly envy those who perhaps make a better. They also dread the being slighted; of course are suspicious, and captious; are uneasy themselves and make everybody else so about them.

A certain degree of outward seriousness in looks and actions gives dignity, while a constant smirk upon the face (that insipid silly smile which fools have when they would be civil) and whistling motions, are strong marks of futility.

But above all a dignity of character is to be acquired best by a certain certain firmness in all our actions. A mean, timid and passive complaisance lets a man down more than he is aware of: but still his firmness and resolution should not extend to brutality, but be accompanied with a peculiar and engaging softness, or mildness.

If you discover any hastiness in your temper, and find it apt to break out into rough and unguarded expressions, watch it narrowly, and endeavour to curb it; but let no complaisance, no weak desire of pleasing, no wheedling urge you to do that which discretion forbids; but persist and persevere in all that is right. In your connections and friendships, you will find this rule of use to you. Invite and preserve attachments by your firmness: but labour to keep clear of enemies, by a mildness of behaviour. Disarm those enemies you may unfortunately have, (and few are without them) by a gentleness of manner, but make them feel the steadiness of your just resentment; for there is a wide difference between bearing malice and a determined self defence; the one is imperious, but the other is prudent and justifiable.

In directing your servants, or any person you have a right to command; if you deliver your orders mildly, and in that engaging manner which every gentleman should study to do, you would be cheerfully, and consequently well obeyed; but if tyrannically, you would be very unwillingly served if served at all.
A cool, steady determination should show that you will be obeyed, but a gentleness in the manner of enforcing that obedience should make your service a cheerful one. Thus you will be loved without being despised, and feared without being hated.

I hope I need not mention vices. A man who has patiently been kicked out of company, may have as good a pretence to courage, as one rendered infamous by his vices, may to dignity of any kind: however, of such consequences are appearances, that an outward decency and an affected dignity of manners will even keep such a man the longer from sinking. If therefore you should unfortunately have no intrinsic merit of your own, keep up, if possible, the appearance of it; and the world will possibly give you credit for the rest. A versatility of manners is as necessary in social life, as a versatility of parts in political. This is no way blameable, if not used with an ill design. We must, like the cameleon, often put on the hue of the persons we wish to be well with: and it surely can never be blameable, to endeavour to gain the good will or affection of any one, if when obtained, we do not mean to abuse it.
HAVING now given you full and sufficient instructions for making you well received in the best of companies; nothing remains but that I lay before you some few rules for your conduct in such company. Many things on this subject I have mentioned before; but some few matters remain to be mentioned now.

1. Talk, then frequently but not long together, lest you tire the persons you are speaking to; for few persons talk so well upon a subject, as to keep up the attention of their hearers for any length of time.

2. Avoid telling stories in company, unless they are very short.
short indeed, and very applicable to the subject you are upon; in this case relate them in as few words as possible, without the least digression, and with some apology; as that you hate the telling of stories, but the shortness of it induced you. And, if your story has any wit in it, be particularly careful not to laugh at it yourself. Nothing is more tiresome and disagreeable than a long tedious narrative; it betrays a gossipping disposition, and great want of imagination; and nothing is more ridiculous than to express an approbation of your own story, by a laugh.

3. In relating any thing, keep clear of repetitions or very hackneyed expressions, such as, says he, or says she. Some people will use these these so often, as to take off the hearers attention from the story; as, in an organ out of tune, one pipe shall perhaps sound the whole time we are playing, and confuse the piece, so as not to be understood.

4. Digressions, likewise should be guarded against. A story is always more agreeable without them. Of this kind are, "the gentleman I am telling you of, is the son of Sir Thomas,—who lives in Harley street;—you must know him—his brother had a horse that won the sweep stakes at the last Newmarket meeting—Zounds! if you don't know him you know nothing."

Or, "He was an upright tall old gentleman, who wore his own long hair: don't you recollect him?—All this is unnecessary; is very tiresome some and provoking, and would be an excuse for a man's behaviour, if he was to leave us in the midst of our narrative.

5. Some people have a trick of holding the persons they are speaking to by the button, or the hand, in order to be heard out; conscious, I suppose, that their tale is tiresome. Pray never do this: if the person you speak to is not as willing to hear your story, as you are to tell it, you had much better break off in the middle; for if you tire them once, they will be afraid to listen to you a second time.

6. Others have a way of punching the person they are talking to in the side, and at the end of every sentence, asking him some such questions as the following: “Wasn't
"Wasn't I right in that?" "You know I told you so? What's your opinion?" and the like; or perhaps they will be thrusting him, or jogging him with their elbow. For mercy's sake never give way to this; it will make your company dreaded.

7. Long talkers are frequently apt to single out some unfortunate man present; generally the most silent one of the company, or probably him who sits next to him. To this man in a kind of half whisper they will run on for half an hour together. Nothing can be more ill-bred. But, if one of these unmerciful talkers should attack you, if you wish to oblige him, I would recommend the hearing him with patience: seem to do so at least, for you could not not hurt him more than to leave him in the middle of his story, or discover any impatience in the course of it.

8. Incessant talkers are very disagreeable companions. Nothing can be more rude than to engross the conversation to yourself, or to take the words, as it were, out of another man's mouth. Every man in company has an equal claim to bear his part in the conversation, and to deprive him of it is not only unjust, but a tacit declaration that he cannot speak so well upon the subject as yourself; you will therefore take it up. And what can be more rude? I would as soon forgive a man that should stop my mouth when I was gaping, as take my words from me while I was speaking them. Now,
Now, if the one be unpardonable, the other cannot be less so.

9. To help out or forestall the slow speaker as if you alone were rich in expressions and he were poor. You may take it for granted, every one is vain enough to think he can talk well, though he may modestly deny it; helping a person therefore out in his expressions, is a correction that will stamp the corrector with impudence and ill manners.

10. Those who contradict others upon all occasions, and make every assertion a matter of dispute, betray by this behaviour an unacquaintance with good-breeding. He therefore who wishes to appear amiable with those he converses with, will be cautious of such expressions as these, "That O can't "can't be true, Sir," "The affair is as I lay." "That must be false, Sir." "If what you say is true," &c. You may as well tell a man he lies at once, as thus indirectly impeach his veracity. It is equally as rude to be proving every trifling assertion with a bet or a wager. "I'll bet you fifty of it, and so on." Make it then a constant rule in matters of no great importance, complaifantly to submit your opinion to that of others; for a victory of this kind often costs a man the lots of a friend.

11. Giving advice unasked is another piece of rudeness; it is in effect, declaring ourselves wiser than those to whom we give it; reproaching them with ignorance and inexperience. It is a freedom that
that ought not to be taken with any common acquaintance, and yet there are those, who will be offended, if their advice is not taken. "Such-a-one," say they, is above being advised. "He scorns to listen to my advice;" as if it were not a mark of greater arrogance to expect every one to submit to their opinion than for a man sometimes to follow his own.

12. There is nothing so unpardonably rude, as a seeming inattention to the person who is speaking to you; though you may meet with it in others, by all means, avoid it yourself. Some ill-bred people, while others are speaking to them, will instead of looking at, or attending to them, perhaps fix their eyes on the ceiling, or some picture in the room;
look out of the window, play with a dog, their watch chain, or their cane, or probably pick their nails or their noses. Nothing betrays a more trifling mind than this; nor can any thing be a greater affront to the person speaking; it being a tacit declaration, that what he is saying is not worth your attention. Consider with yourself how you would like such treatment, and I am persuaded you will never shew it to others.

13. Surliness or moroseness is incompatible also with politeness. Such as, should any one say “he was desired to present Mr. Such-" a-one’s respects to you,” to reply, “What the devil have I to "do with his respects?”—“My "Lord enquired after you lately, "and asked how you did,” to answer, "if he wishes to know, let him come and feel my pulse;" and the like. A good deal of this often is affected; but whether affected or natural, it is always offensive. A man of this stamp will occasionally be laughed at as an oddity; but in the end, will be despised.

14. I should suppose it unnecessary to advise you to adapt your conversation to the company you are in. You would not surely start the same subject; and discourse of it in the same manner with the old and with the young, with an officer, a clergyman a philosopher, and a woman? No, your good sense will undoubtedly teach you to be serious with the serious, gay with the gay, and to trifle with the triflers.
15. There are certain expressions which are exceedingly rude, and yet there are people of liberal education that sometimes use them; as “You don’t understand me, sir.” “It is not so.” “You mistake.” “You know nothing of the matter,” &c. Is it not better to say? “I believe, I do not express myself so as to be understood.” “Let us consider it again, whether we take it right or not.” It is much more polite and amiable to make some excuse for another, even in cases where he might justly be blamed, and to represent the mistake as common to both, rather than charge him with insensibility or incomprehension.

16. If any one should have promised you anything and not have have fulfilled that promise, it would be very unpolite to tell him; he has forfeited his word; or if the same person should have disappointed you, upon any occasion, would it not be better to say,
"you were probably so much engaged, that you forgot my affair;" or, Perhaps it slipped
"your memory;" rather than,
"You thought no more about
"it," or, "you pay very little regard to your word." For expressions of this kind leave a sting behind them. They are a kind of provocation and affront, and very often bring on lasting quarrels.

17. Be careful not to appear dark and mysterious, least you should be thought suspicious;
than which there cannot be a more
unamiable character. If you appear mysterious and reserved, others will be truly so with you; and in this case there is an end to improvement, for you will gather no information. Be reserved but never seem so.

18. There is a fault extremely common with some people which I would have you to avoid. When their opinion is asked upon any subject, they will give it with so apparent a diffidence and timidity, that one cannot, without the utmost pain, listen to them; especially if they are known to be men of universal knowledge. "Your lordship will pardon me," says one of this stamp, "If I should not be able to speak to the case in hand, so well as might be wished."—"I’ll ven"tured to speak of this matter to the best of my poor abilities, and dulness of apprehension."—"I fear I shall expose myself, but in obedience to your lordship's commands,"—and while they are making these apologies, they interrupt the business and tire the company.

19. Always look people in the face, when you speak to them, otherwise you will be thought conscious of some guilt; besides you lose the opportunity of reading their countenances, from which you will much better learn the impression your discourse makes upon them than you can possibly do from their words; for words are at the will of every one, but the countenance is frequently involuntary.

20. If
20. If in speaking to a person, you are not heard, and should be desired to repeat what you said, do not raise your voice in the repetition, lest you should be thought angry, on being obliged to repeat what you had said before; it was probably owing to the hearer's inattention.

21. One word only, as to swearing. Those who addict themselves to it, and interlard their discourse with oaths, can never be considered as gentlemen; they are generally people of low education, and are unwelcome in what is called good company. It is a vice that has no temptation to plead, but is, in every respect, as vulgar as it is wicked.

22. Never accustom yourself to scandal nor listen to it; for tho'
It may gratify the malevolence of some people; nine times out of ten, it is attended with great disadvantages. The very persons you tell it to, will, on reflection, entertain a mean opinion of you, and it will often bring you into very disagreeable situations. And as there would be no evil speakers, if there were no evil hearers; it is in scandal as in robbery, the receiver is as bad as the thief. Besides, it will lead people to shun your company, supposing that you will speak ill of them to the next acquaintance you meet.

23. Mimickry, the favourite amusement of little minds has been, ever the contempt of great one's. Never give way to it yourself, nor ever encourage it in others; it is the most illiberal of all buffoonery, buffoonery, it is an insult on the person you mimic; and insults, I have often told you are seldom forgiven.

24. Carefully avoid talking either of your own or other people's domestic concerns. By doing the one, you will be thought vain; by entering into the other, you will be considered as officious. Talking of yourself is an impertinence to the company; your affairs are nothing to them; besides they cannot be kept too secret. And as to the affairs of others, what are they to you? In talking of matters that no way concern you, you are liable to commit blunders, and should you touch any one in a fore part, you may possibly lose his esteem. Let your conversation then in mixed companies always be general.

25. Jokes,
25. Jokes, bon-mots, or the little pleasantries of one company, will not often bear to be told in another; they are frequently local, and take their rise from certain circumstances, a second company may not be acquainted with these circumstances, and of course your story may be misunderstood, or want explaining; and if after you have prefaced it with,—"I will tell you a good thing;"—the sting should not be immediately perceived; you will appear exceedingly ridiculous, and wish you had not told it. Never then, without caution, repeat in one place, what you hear in another.

26. In most debates, take up the favourable side of the question; however, let me caution you against being clamorous, that is, never never maintain an argument with heat, though you know yourself right; but offer your sentiments modestly and coolly, and if this does not prevail, give it up, and try to change the subject by saying something to this effect; "I find we shall hardly convince one another, neither is there any necessity to attempt it; so let us talk of something else."

27. Not that I would have you give up your opinion always; no, assert your own sentiments, and oppose those of others when wrong, but let your manner and voice be gentle and engaging and yet no ways affected. If you contradict, do it with, "I may be wrong,—I won't be positive but I really think—I should rather suppose—if I may be permitted permitted to say,"—and close your dispute with good humour, to shew that you are neither displeased yourself nor meant to displease the person you dispute with.

28. Acquaint yourself with the character and situation of the company you go into, before you give a loose to your tongue; for should you enlarge on some virtue, which any one present may notoriously want; or should you condemn some vice, which any of the company may be particularly addicted to, they will be apt to think your reflections pointed and personal, and you will be sure to give offence. This consideration will naturally lead you not to suppose things said in general, to be levelled at you.

29. Low-bred people, when they happen occasionally to be in good company, imagine themselves to be the subject of every separate conversation. If any part of the company whispers, it is about them; if they laugh, it is at them; and if any thing is said which they do not comprehend, they immediately suppose it is meant of them. This mistake is admirably ridiculed in one of our celebrated comedies. "I am sure, says Scrub, they were talking of me, for they laughed con"sumedly." Now, a well-bred person never thinks himself disesteemed by the company, or laughed at, unless their reflections are so gross, that he cannot be supposed to mistake them, and his honour obliges him to retent it in a proper manner; however be affured,
fured, gentlemen never laugh at or ridicule one another, unless they are in joke, or on a footing of the greatest intimacy. If such a thing should happen once in an age, from some pert coxcomb, or some flippant woman, it is better to seem not to know it, than make the least reply.

30. It is a piece of politeness not to interrupt a person in a story, whether you have heard it before or not. Nay, if a well-bred man is asked, whether he has heard it; he will answer no, and let the person go on, though he knows it already. Some are fond of telling a story, because they think they tell it well, others pride themselves in being the first teller of it, and others are pleased at being thought entrusted with it. Now, all all these persons you would disappoint by answering yes. And, as I have told you before, as the greatest proof of politeness is to make every body happy about you, I would never deprive a person of any secret satisfaction of this sort, when I could gratify him by a minute's attention.

31. Be not ashamed of asking questions, if such questions lead to information; always accompany them with some excuse, and you never will be reckoned impertinent. But, abrupt questions, without some apology, by all means avoid as they imply design. There is a way of fishing for facts, which if done judiciously, will answer every purpose, such as, taking things you wish to know for granted: this will perhaps lead some some officious person to set you right. So again by saying, you have heard so and so, and sometimes seeming to know more than you do, you will often get at information which you would lose by direct questions, as these would put people upon their guard, and frequently defeat the very end you aim at.

32. Make it a rule never to reflect on any body of people, for, by this means you will create a number of enemies. There are good and bad of all professions, lawyers, soldiers, parsons or citizens. They are all men, subject to the same passions, differing only in their manner, according to the way they have been bred up in. For this reason it is unjust as well as indiscreet, to attack them as
as a corps collectively. Many a young man has thought himself extremely clever in abusing the clergy. What are the clergy more than other men? Can you suppose a black gown can make any alteration in his nature? Fie, fie; think seriously and I am convinced you will never do it.

33. But above all, let no example, no fashion, no witticism, no foolish desire of rising above what knaves call prejudices, tempt you to excuse, extenuate or ridicule the least breach of morality, but upon every occasion, shew the greatest abhorrence of such proceedings, and hold virtue and religion in the highest veneration.

34. It is a great piece of illmanners to interrupt any one while speaking, by speaking yourself, self, or calling off the attention of the company to any foreign matter. But this every child knows.

35. The last thing I shall mention is that of concealing your learning, except on particular occasions. Reserve this for learned men, and let them rather extort it from you than you be too willing to display it. Hence you will be thought modest, and to have more knowledge than you really have. Never seem wise or more learned than the company you are in. He who affects to shew his learning will be frequently questioned; and if found superficial, will be sneered at; if otherwise he will be deemed a pedant. Real merit will always show itself, and nothing can lessen it in the opinion of the world, but a man's exhibiting it himself.
For God's sake revolve all these things seriously in your mind, before you go abroad into life. Recollect the observations you have yourself occasionally made upon men and things, compare them with my instructions, and act wisely and consequently, as they shall teach you.
